“ Growing up, I learned a lot about what it meant to be responsible by watching my grandfather. Every week he was outside doing something—cutting the grass, painting, fixing things around the house. I was really young, but he always let me help. While we worked, he'd talk to me about life and what it meant to be a man. Those are some of my favorite childhood memories. I even remember the $5 tips he'd give me afterward for helping him.

If there's one thing I regret, it's not doing more with him while I had the chance. I wish I could've gone to an Oakland A's game with him. He loved watching the A's, and sharing that with him would've meant a lot. Or even just sitting down, man to man, and asking him questions about his life.

It still amazes me that my grandfather was born in 1927 and was a teenager during World War II. He lived through so much history. Looking back, I really wish I had sat down with him more and just listened to his stories.
